Chapter Heading, Ernest Hemingway, Meditation. There is a disparity between the self that we present to the world, the self that we are today, and the self that we hope to be. In his characteristically sparse lines, Hemingway challenges us to examine the conflict in duality between our inner spirit and the way we live our lives and present to the world.

Chapter Heading by Ernest M. Hemingway uses ABCBDB structure. The poem talks about the endless pointless thoughts humans ponder about philosophy, creation, and the idols we worship "devils' tunes." He proposes that we serve one god by day and another by night, how our interests and worship are divided between the two, and how we are prone to choose the easier way even if it is not the right way.
